Transmission valve to reduce tractor accidents

Deere & Company has announced that in the interest of farm safety it will make available at no cost to the farm equipment industry its patents for a transmission device that reduces the risks of tractor accidents.

The special transmission valve, which was developed at the John Deere product engineering center in Waterloo, Iowa, prevents hydraulically activated transmission clutches from engaging unless the clutch pedal has been depressed and released by the operator following each start.

Operators have been injured when they improperly started their tractors by bypassing normal circuitry while standing on the ground. It is a practice that manufacturers have urged farmers not to use and have tried to discourage through other design changes.

The danger in such a start, of course, is that the tractor will move if the transmission is in gear. With the Deere safety device in the clutch hydraulic circuit, the machine won't go into motion following a start even when it is in gear, at least not until the operator mounts the machine and depresses and releases the clutch pedal.
