Bac to the Farm.

When we're young and free from pain, we used to eat a plenty, but when we tell about it now they say 'tas enough for twenty. We usl to have corn-dodger bread bake to a brittle brown, each pone would show the finger prints of the one who put it down, and alway at the noon-day meal we had a pt of greens, or cabbages or blek-eyed peas, or Kentucky Woder beans. Great shakes! how we would eat, after plowing all day long; we'd climb astride a steaty mule and ride home wit a song. Along a pathway nxt to the fence, while darkness limbed the hills; we heard the lowing of the cows and the song of the whip-o-wills. The smok from half burned heaps of leves floated lazily in the air, which seemed already loaded down with woodland odors rare. [illegible] Beck, after giving [illegible] she'd soft step upon our foot and we'd see a million stars. After all the stock were safely stalled and everything in place, we'd take the year cut to the house and wash our hands and face. The coarse crash towel hanging near was often used in haste, for we were hungry as a dog, how good then vittels taste. There was a lot of left over stuff 'twas cold but how delicious, for when man has plowed all day he's not at all capricious. Perhaps a dish of bacon hot, home-cured and cut in slices, and buttermilk right from the spring, that was better far than ices. The things that on the table now disgusts us beyond question, we've got the old time appetite, but we're minus the digestion. We are getting awful dog-gone tired of wearing out our jaws, on scientific Jim cracks, [illegible] slaws; we wish we had a dish of beans with dodgers brittle, brown; we wish we were on the farm again and the sun was going down.

Instead of trying to stir up trouble in this old world, let us get busy and help those who are [illegible] shall enjoy the change.

REVIVAL CONTINUES AT METHODIST CHURCH

Evangelist Whaling Delivering Soul-Stiring Sermons And Great Good in Eagle Lake Will Result.

The Methodist revival, conducted by Evangelist W. H. Whaling, continues with much interest manifested. Good sized crowds are attending the service, and the attendance last Sunday night was a record-breaker. Every seat was occupied and many people sat in automobiles and buggies out in the street. The service Wednesday night was held out in the city park and was well attended. There will be services tonight at 8:30 o'clock, Saturday morning at 9:00 o'clock. There will be no Saturday night service. Services Sunday morning at 11:00 o'clock and Sunday evening at 8:30. The day services are being held in the church, but the night services in the open, on the lawn across the street from the church. Rev. Mr. Whaling is an exceptionally strong preacher and has been delivering some powerful sermons. Much good will be the result from his efforts here and the Methodist church strengthened and all the Christian people of the town encouraged to a more useful and better life. The revival will likely close with Sunday night's services. All the people of the town and surrounding country are cordially invited to attend the few remain-services of the revival.

Mr. L. E. Burttschell left this afternoon for a visit to Wilkes-Barre, Pennsylvania. Mrs. Burttschell and sister, Miss Mary Thomas, preceded him there a few weeks ago for a visit to their parents. Mr. and Mrs. Burttschell and Miss Thomas, after spending several weeks at that place, will visit Niagra Falls and other points of interest before returning home.

Is Last Survivor of the Merrimac.

Living quietly for the last eight years and more, John McGuire, who was officially notified from Washington last week that he is the last survivor of the memorable naval battle between the Monitor and the Merrimac, is passing the closing years of his life at his home in Somerville, near the line of the Central Railroad of New Jersey, from whose service he retired almost ten years ago after more than forty years.

Mr. McGuire is now 76 years of age. He was born in Ireland, coming to this country when a young man. Although he feels the weight of years, he enjoyed comparatively good health up to a few years ago, is still able to get about town every day. When a representative of the press called upon him he was working in the garden at the rear of his home.

Mr. McGuire during the civil war was a stoker on the confederate battleship Merrimac and participated in the battle between that vessel and the Monitor in Hampton Roads in the spring of 1862.

Soon afterward Mr. McGuire began his employment on the railroad and before his retirement at the end of the year 1905 had served for fifteen or twenty years as a passenger brakeman. He was retired on a pension of $21.50 a month, besides which he received a perpetual pass over all divisions and branches of the road.

Mr. McGuire walks erect and is remarkably well preserved for his years. He enjoys the annual gatherings of the veteran employes of the railroad, and always keeps in touch with the affairs of the road. While a passenger brakeman his quiet and unassuming manner won for him hosts of friends among the commuters. He never married, and now makes a home with the family of one of his old friends.

Master Kenneth Harris left Wednesday for a visit to his grandparents in Elgin. This is Kenneth's first trip alone, and no doubt he will have many experiences to relate to his parents on his return.

Judd Lewis.

"I am just a singin,' lovin, sympathizin,' laughin, sort o' lazy sort of chap."

That is about as much as anybody ever persuaded Judd Mortimer to say about himself. And his modest description of himself is inaccurate. He is one of the hardest working men in the biggest states in the Union. Writing 1500 words of verse and humor paragraphs a day is a man-sized job, but it does not keep Lewis from making himself one of the most useful public men in the Southwest. Most poets carry side lines from necessity—or make verse writing a side line—but not so in the case of Judd Lewis. A weekly check from the counting room of the Houston Post keeps the wolf out of howling distance of the Lewis home, and for his work outside his sanctum the poet receives no remuneration except the satisfaction which comes from doing something to brighten the lives of others. Nearly every one of his poems is a cheer line thrown out to the soul-weary, but his work as a placer of homeless babies in babyless homes will be remembered as long as, if not longer than, his rhymes.

The Judd Lewis baby bureau is strictly a one-man affair and free from red tape. It was started about six years ago, but did not amount to much during the first three or four years. The work had to be built up slowly. Mr. Lewis made a thorough personal investigation of every couple applying for a baby to adopt, and the result was that every child was well placed. His success was talked about all over Texas and in many places outside the state, and he became widly known as a friend of homeless babies. Now, whenever there is a baby in need of a good home or a married couple looking for a child to adopt, Mr. Lewis is sure to hear about it. He keeps in touch with the public by means of the little paragraphs in his column in The Post. Here is one of his notices:

"Thirty pounds of boy for adoption. One package consists of twenty pounds; a real, sure 'nuff white hope. The other package weighs ten pounds—perhaps a little more after dinner. Each is looking for a job at making some childless couple happy. They will teach you the sweetness of dimpled arms about your neck, a baby cheek pressed against your world-worn cheek, the sound of baby laughter."

Once Mr. Lewis received a letter from an 18 year-old wife in an Eastern city, who said she and her husband who was 21, had been married six months and wanted to adopt a light-haired, blue-eyed girl. He advised her to write Santa Claus a letter when Christmas came around, hang up her stocking, and utter a little prayer when the shades of night came down, and not to write again for a year; then, if they still wanted him to find them a baby, he would get busy. Mr. Lewis never heard from her again.—Collier's Weekly.

Mr. and Mrs. N. F. Frazar returned Tuesday from a few days' visit to his daughter, Mrs. Edward Cubage, in Corpus Christi. They were accompanied home by Mr. Frazar's granddaughter, little Miss Hugh Roy Brown, who will spend some time here with them.

Happy is the man who can forget all the mean things he knows about himself.
