water. Mother gathered the white children in our cart. They behaved very well and went to sleep, except one little boy. Eli Dyer, who kicked and cried for Uncle Ned and Aunt Dilue till Uncle Ned came and carried him to the wagon. He slept that night in Uncle Ned's arms.

Mother with all the negro women and children walked six miles to the timber and found the river and helped with the ferry boat, but in the evening the boat grounded on the east bank of the Trinity and didn't get back until morning. While they were gone the horses had stayed at and they had to find them before they could go to the wagons. Those that traveled on horseback were supplied with provisions.

At the Trinity river men from the army began to join their families. I know they have been blamed for this, but what else could they have done? The Texas army was retreating and the Mexicans were crossing the Colorado. Col. Fannin and his men were prisoners; there were more negroes than whites among us and many of them were wild Africans; there was a large tribe of Indians on the Trinity as well as the Cherokee Indians in Eastern Texas at Nacogdoches; and there were Tories, both Mexicans and Americans, in the country. It was the intention of our men to see their families across the Sabine river, and then return and fight the Mexicans. I must say for the negroes that there was no insubordination among them; they were loyal to their owners.

Our hardships began at the Trinity. The river was rising and there was a struggle to see who should cross first. Measles, sore eyes, whooping cough, and every other disease that man, woman, or child is heir to, broke out among us. Our party now consisted of the five white families I first mentioned, and Mr. Adam Stafford's negroes. We had separated from Mrs. M. and other friends at Vin's bridge. The horrors of crossing the Trinity are beyond my power to describe. One of my little sisters was very sick, and the ferryman said that those families that had sick children should cross first. When our party got to the boat the water broke over the banks above where we were and ran around us. We were several hours surrounded by water. Our family was the last to get to the boat. We left more than five hundred people on the west bank. Drift wood, against the water as far as we could see. The sick child was in convulsions. It required eight men to manage the boat.

Mexican Charged With Selling Booze on Sunday.

City Marshal H. S. Vineyard last Monday arrested Francisco Irelia, a Mexican, on a charge of selling whisky on Sunday. Mr. Vineyard says he thought the Saturday night whisky was lasting a little too long on Sunday and began to look about to see where it was coming from. He speaks fluently and understands the Spanish language, and heard two Mexicans talking in their native tongue, when one made the remark, "I told you I could sell a bottle, didn't you?" and about that time our city marshal joined in the conversation. The Mexicans at first denied having any whisky, but Mr. Vineyard found the bottle of whisky in one of the Mexican's pockets, after which he said he bought it from Francisco Irelia. Several negroes also admitted having bought whisky from the Mexicans.

been conducting a little restaurant in the rear of Mr. Brosig's saloon, and it is alleged that he bought the whisky on Saturday and retailed it out on Sunday. The prisoner was taken to Columbus where he will answer the charge to the state and county, after which his case will be handled by the federal authorities.

Matz, and reached Houston at 5:20 o'clock Sunday morning after a record run in a special train over the Brownsville road, being the earliest in the history of the cotton crop, arriving ten days ahead of the previous world's record and was sold on the floor of the Houston Cotton Exchange Monday for the world's record price of $1.015. The bale was bid in by Jesse H. Jones of Houston.

They regulate Stomach, Liver and Kidneys, purify the blood; give strong nerves, bright eyes, pure breath, smooth, velvety skin, lovely complexion and perfect health. Misses Fritz Engelhardt and J. L. Smith returned Wednesday from College Station, where they attended the commencement exercises at ball. They report having spent a most delightful time. The commencement ball was quite a swell affair, the programs being attached to handsome leather pocket books, which would probably cost in the neighborhood of $2.50 each.

Reminiscences

Mrs. Dilue Harris.

MARCH, 1836. CROSSING THE TRINITY. RETREATING BEFORE THE MEXICAN ARMY UNDER GENERAL SANTA ANNA.

When we landed the lowlands were under water, and every body was pushing for the prairie. Father had a good horse, and Mrs. Dyer let mother have her horse and saddle. Father carried the sick child, and sister and I rode behind mother. She carried father's gun and the little babe. All we carried with us was what clothes we were wearing at the time. The night was very dark. We crossed a bridge that was under water. As soon as we crossed, a man with a cart and oxen drove on the bridge, and it broke down, drowning the oxen. That prevented the people from crossing, as the bridge was over a slough that looked like a river.

Father and mother hurried on, and we got to the prairie and found a great many families camped there. A Mrs. Foster invited mother to her camp, and furnished us with supper, a bed, and dry clothes.

The other families stayed all night in the bottom without fire or anything to eat, and the water up in the carts. The men drove the horses and oxen to the prairie, and the women, sick children, and negroes were left in the bottom. The old negro man, Uncle Ned, was left in charge. He put the white women and children in his wagon. It was large and had a canvas cover. The negro women and their children he put in the carts. Then he guarded the whole party until morning.

It was impossible for the men to return to their families. They spent the night making a raft by torch light.
