J. D. Townsend Killed.

Visitors in Houston last night from Louise, Texas, gave information concerning the tragedy there yesterday morning in which Constable Townsend lost his life and a saloon keeper, John Gandry, was perhaps mortally wounded.

There had been friction between the two men for some time, so it is stated. Yesterday morning Constable Townsend went to Gandry's saloon and the shooting began at once. Gandry was hit three times, once in the leg, once over the left eye and then in the abdomen. He received these wounds before he could secure his pistol. After he secured his pistol Townsend was shot in the temple, inflicting a wound which caused instant death.—Houston Post.

Tommy was an apprentice and had only been in his situation three weeks when he plucked up courage to ask his "boss" for a wage in discharge of his duties he performed. He tapped rather feebly at his employer's door, and entered to a gruff "Come in."

"Well?" inquired his employer. "Pre-please sir," blurted out Tommy, "I want a raise."

"A raise?" inquired the "boss," "How much do you get now?"

"Nothing, sir," replied the young man hopefully.

"Then I'll double it," said the hardhearted "boss" and went on writing.

If a woman ever expects to keep the respect of men she should never so far forget herself as to get angry and give free rein to her tongue. A gentleman can't talk back in like strain, but he surely does a lot of hot thinking. Giving other people "a piece of her mind" is something she will surely regret.
