Mr. Mosely attributes his phenomenal success in raising corn to his system of cultivation. He also brought to town with him a forty-four pound watermelon which he raised.

We Will Know Some Day
Yesterday I was at the railroad station and purchased a ticket for a short journey that I took that day. While at the ticket window there stood beside me one of the world's unfortunates. His clothing consisted of one old, red shirt, so faded that its original color was not distinguishable, and a pair of patched blue jean trousers, his hair was uncombed, and his personal appearances unkempt. Upon his face were the unmistakable marks of ignorance and a hard struggle with the adversities of life. His condition was deplorable, but there were two little girls with him whose smileless little faces were pitiable indeed. There was no sunlight, there had been no childish happiness, no merry laughter had made music in the hovel that they had called home, and hunger had sat beside them many a long, dreary day going to their pallet with them, lingering in their dreams, jeering at them when the morning awoke again.

A friend who sat with me at the time and whose heart is as tender as a maiden's, asked the man where he was going, and he replied that he was going back to Kentucky because he had made nothing in Texas for four years. In such haste was he to get on the train and commence his journey back to his old home that he left his change on this window, and the ticket seller had called him back, knowing that the seventy-five cents change represented a large sum to the man and children. Life is full of such conditions and such unfortunate people are around us and about us. This poor fellow had, no doubt, made the best fight that he could to provide for his family, handicapped with the lack of knowledge, and while he was straining every nerve, eating out his heart in vain endeavor, maybe the grim reaper came into the sunless home and carried away the father.

Two little girls, she yielding up her tired body with little reluctance except the thought of leaving her babies motherless. I can not unravel the riddle why there are so many of life's unfortunates, why the eyes of sweet little children should be dalled, the tears of longing for the things they crave so much and their faces made gaunt by lack of food, while there are thousands of other children with everything that their hearts crave and luxuries piled upon luxuries laid at their feet. One's heart can not help but go out in sympathy for the man and children, but especially the children whose bodily hunger and whose heart hunger is pitiable. Maybe when the last trumpet is sounded and the last summons comes we will know why some people are poor and lonely and ignorant, while others are rich, happy and contented. There must be a reason, for a well-matured plan runs through all the story of the past and ages to come, outlined from the beginning, having in view the final good of man. Perhaps some must suffer that others may be induced to feel sympathy, and be constrained to minister to the wants of the needy and cheer and comfort the lonely and the desolate. -J. R. Ransome in Cleburne Enterprise.

A New Kind of Graft.

Here's a new kind of graft, as related by the Rushville, Mo., News: The other day a man and his 10-year-old son boarded a southbound Rock Island train at Weston. The father placed the boy in a seat at the front end of the car and took the seat just behind him. When the conductor came through the car, the boy told him he was a doctor.

"Not money," he said he had run off from his home in Weston and was going to visit his grandmother in Kansas City, whereupon the father of boy jumped up, took off his hat and placed a dollar in it, after which he passed it among the other men passengers in the car. When several dollars was collected the father gave the money to the boy. Presumably there was another division later.

Several years ago it was no trouble at all to find a vacant farm in this country. There are now no vacant farms, and the only way a man can get a place is to buy one—if he can find one that can be bought.

A man who wouldn't fight for his town in a pinch shouldn't feel peeved if the town lays down upon him at a critical moment.

More horses and mules should be raised on small farms in the Southwest. At the present prices for heavy work stock there is profit in raising teams. But it must be remembered that a pasture will be a necessity. The antiquated idea of cultivating every acre of land in some field crop must be modified. A pasture is a necessity these days.

Lots of people pretend progressiveness but their actions give this the denial. After all, action are what count.
