COUNTRY GETS FINE RAIN YESTERDAY

A fine rain fell here all day yesterday. The crisp Norther which blew up last night will dry off things in a day or two and the farmers will be able to go ahead with all kinds of farm work by Monday. The rain was needed and will be of much benefit to farming conditions of all kinds. So far the present year the weather conditions could not have been more favorable to the farmers had the weather been "made to order."

Setters.

Farmer Jones was tugging away with all his strength at a barrel of cider, trying to get it up the cellar steps. He called at the top of his voice for help, with no response. After much struggling he accomplished the task, and just then the whole family put in their appearance.

"Where have you been?" inquired the farmer to his wife.

"I was setting the bread."

"And you?" addressing his eldest boy.

"Out in the shop, setting a saw."

"And you, Eary?"

"Up in grandma's room, setting a clock."

"And you Cyrus?"

"Out in the barn, setting a hen."

"And you, Hiram?"

"Up in a garret, setting a trap."

"And now, Master Rufus, where were you, and what were you setting?" asked the farmer of his youngest son.

"Out on the doorsteps, setting still."

The Old Things Are Better.

"I mean to write a sermon on this text sometime," said the prettiest woman in the group. "We are all going crazy nowadays over novelty, new fashions, new inventions, seeing new places,—but I tell you the old things are half the time better,—the old friends, always; the good, old furniture, which is so often discarded for newer patterns not half so really nice. And I love a good old dress that I am used to and that has become a sort of a part of me. Add old shoes. Is there anything on earth quite so comfortable and delightful as a pair of soft, desirable old shoes?"
