collster talking to an obviously haggard consumer who is standing at the front door wearing a noose around his neck? The caption reads: "It's a poll on how the consumer is doing -- I hope I'm not disturbing anything."

Not too funny, but directly to the point. Texas does not have a monetary recession -- but we may have a mental recession which can hurt just as much. Consumer confidence has been eroded by recession psychology which is amplified by the high cost of living.

However, look at the facts before you leap. Texas has one of the lowest unemployment rites in the tion. In caras places, nearly 98% of our people are working. The majority of our Standard Metropolitan Statistical Areas actually-show a drop in unemployment. Bryan-College Station, according to government predictions, will soon be among the highest growth areas in the nation for personal income. Texas has the lowest cost of living rates in the nation. Witness: the national television news story about costing less to live in Austin than anywhere else--and the other national news story about the strong job market in Odessa.

The public attitude about recession can be changed. And only then, can the individual do something about inflation. Smart consumers are the ones who get the most for their noney. True enough, they cut back on spending--but when a year in the hospital from Manzy Lee Grantham, Natalie they do buy, they buy something that will last longer and give better service.
