Cong. Pickle Comments On Military Draft

[By Cong. J. J. Pickle]

Congress ended the military draft eight years ago in 1971. President Ford discontinued registration in 1975, and there has been no selective service system in the U.S. since then.

This session, however, there are no fewer than six bills proposing some form of selective service system, and an amendment calling for a registration program has been attached to the defense appropriations bill which may come before the House this summer.

These proposals range from a simple form of registration to a return to full-fledged draft. A new approach provides that young Americans could have a choice between military service or a time of national service in some civilian capacity. Another issue to be debated involves whether women should be drafted.

The move to reinstate either registration or the draft is based on the belief that should the U.S. become involved in a full-scale war, the country would not be able to mobilize the forces needed fast enough. We need to have forces ready which are trained and can step in behind our current forces as soon as they are needed. The volunteer army, supporters of the draft say, just hasn't worked.
