Journal-Spectator Egypt's Miss Ivy Tolliver is liberated lady who's lived 84 years, apparently unconscious of any bias against and working women. "I've been working all my ife," says the retired teacher and bookkeeper, "and I don't think there's anything better than having a job that fully occupies your mind." She hasn't got anything against the institution marriage, either, having outlived her "two good husbands." First, Chuck Foulk brought his bride from Oakland in Colorado County to Egypt in 1920, when the newlyweds moved into a frame house George Northington had built for his new gin manager.

"I built this Mr. Northington is reputed to have said to lvy, "but you can live there, too." Thanking him with her customary graciousness, the blue-eyed redhead took up the domestic burdens of a housewife and immediately began teaching school to a dozen or so youngsters in the one-room school house near the Egypt gin. Recollection

"There were George and Harold Northington," she remembers, "and Olive and Mary Louise Duncan. I just loved them all to death. Most everybody walked to school, down the dirt road."

It wasn't a big place, Egypt, but busier than it is now, Ivy recalls. The Northington and Duncan general stores and cotton gins employed a good many men, enough to field a baseball team that played on a lot in Glen Flora

I have an indelible childhood memory of Miss Ivy at work with her figures. It was a blustery November day, right after a blue norther. My brother and I" aged about four and his, had ridden our horses up the dirt road from . my grandfather's house to the Northington store.

A pot-bellied stove woold be burning there, we knew. and there was a big candy jar, too, and all the Grapette we could drink. In other words, the store was heaven on earth to a couple of small fry with wind reddened noses and a giant thirst.
