A New Sugar Substitute
A new sugar substitute - aspartame - is expected to be on the market in about six months. Aspartame, to be marketed under the trade name "Equal" by G. D. Searle Company, was approved recently by the Food and Drug Administration. The new product is made up mainly of two amino acids, phenylalanine and aspartic acid. These, along with other amino acids, are the normal building blocks of protein in foods consumed as part of any healthy diet.

Phenylalanine and aspartic acid, combined in a certain manner, produce an intensely sweet-tasting substance called aspartame. It is about 180 times sweeter than sucrose (sugar).

Aspartame has FDA approval for use as a sweetener in the following foods:

- * Dry, free-flowing sugar substitute for table use in package units not to exceed the sweetening equivalent of 2 teaspoons of sugar.
- * Sugar substitute for sweetening hot beverages, including coffee and tea.
- * Cold breakfast cereals.
- * Chewing gum.
- * Dry bases for beverages, instant coffee and tea; gelatins, puddings and fillings; and dairy products and toppings.

FDA approval is based on four additional conditions regarding final product labeling and Searle's record-keeping. * Any food containing aspartame must display a warning statement for phenylketonurics (persons sensitive to phenylalanine, much like diabetics are to sugar) that the product contains the substance.

* A statement not to use aspartame in cooking and baking must appear on the label. Aspartame breaks down when exposed to prolonged heat, with a consequent loss of sweetness.

If a food containing aspartame is represented to be for special dietary use, as might be expected of a low-calorie product, the food must be labeled in compliance with FDA's special dietary food regulation.

* Searle Company is to monitor actual usage levels of aspartame for the FDA.

Advantages that aspartame is supposed to have over other non-nutritive sweeteners are that it is virtually indistinguishable from sugar in taste, has no bitter or metallic aftertaste, and seems to act like a flavor enhancer for some fruits, as monosodium glutamate (MSG) does for high-protein foods.

A major disadvantage is that it is not stable to heat for prolonged periods.
