Prairie Rice receiving harvest on schedule

As predicted the day the control room of Prairie Rice's dryer in Chesterville was destroyed by fire, the dryer began taking rice this week as area farmers began harvesting the 1982 crop.

Although damage extended beyond the control room to one of the dryers, repairs still underway have enabled the company to begin serving its customers on schedule.

Last week, president Jay Anderson and general manager Harold Miller said that although the first estimate was that a manual system would be installed to handle the harvest this summer, then automatic controls would be installed later, now in place is automatic.

In some instances, the replacement equipment is better than original equipment, simply because of the advance in technology as the dryer was built more than a decade ago.

"The plant may not be totally automated now," Miller said, "but about 50 to 90 percent of the equipment is installed and by the end of this week it all should be complete, barring unforeseen problems."

On June 18, workmen reporting for their regular Friday morning shift found the dryer's control room destroyed. Although no one reported seeing smoke or flame during the night when the fire apparently did its damage, it was the intense heat that destroyed the equipment. A short in the electrical feed to the dryer is thought to be the cause of the fire.

After the shock of the fire settled down that Friday, work began at once to make an estimate of the extent of damage, and plans for recovery. Several key employees were on vacation and were recalled, and Miller, scheduled to leave for vacation that night, remained in Chesterville.

Dave Cain, electrician, immediately returned from vacation, and during the next two days, designed the control panels needed for the dryer.

Here and in other instances, Anderson points out, the national economy helped. The Square D factory in Dallas was able to start to work immediately on the plant Cain made. Had it been a normal economy, lag time between order and shipment on such equipment could be several months.

Another benefit of the near disaster is the new equipment that is replacing No. 4 dryer. The old one was removed because of fire damage and the new one is faster and more energy efficient, saving natural gas, and making use of air already heated, rather than expelling it. The fact that it operates at less cost should slow down cost increases, Anderson said.

Also different from first day projections is the fact that crews have not had to work 24-hour shifts to get the work done. "We've worked every day except the Fourth of July," Miller said, with some 10 and 12 hour days.

"Many people, even some in the business, are surprised we are where we are now," he said, referring to their rebuilding progress.

Attitude has been a big factor, he said, with the first day's disbelief quickly turned into confidence in their ability to put it back together better than it was before.
