Bogus termite inspectors

According to the Eagle Lake Police department, one of the annual rites of the spring in this area is the appearance of "bogus termite inspectors," that apparently try to sell termite treatments whether homes are infested or not.

Chief G. Stuenkel said that in one instance reported to police, someone told a homeowner that there were termites in the home.

Stuenkel said the owner called an area insect company, and no termites were found.

Stuenkel said if someone solicits termite inspections door to door, their vehicle license number should be given to the police department.

Farmworker compensation on way to Senate

In Texas politics, the legislator's vote is often quicker than the eye, and last week two controversial bills—betting on horse racing and worker's compensation insurance for farmworkers—made surprise advances.

Political observers wondered: If an unseen tradeoff was involved that caused the House to pass the worker's compensation bill on the same day the Senate passed the pari-mutuel wagering bill, and 2) whether either measure would live to arrive safely at the governor's desk.

An unusual coalition of urban liberals, rural conservatives and minority legislators voted together Tuesday to approve almost simultaneously the two controversial bills which had made little progress in preceding legislatures.

It may have the slickest bit of political flimflam yet this session, but the backtracking could be all for naught, at least for one of the issues. Both bills must clear the "other chamber," one or both could be defeated as in earlier legislatures.

Under the bill's provisions, "burlesque betting would first have to be approved by a statewide referendum, and clearing that hurdle, interested counties would hold local-option elections on track betting. Some 14 tracks are now operating in Texas, even though gambling is not legally allowed, and proponents argue that betting will enhance the industry. Over a quarter of a million spectators attended races which totaled over $5 million in purses last year.

Eight percent of the bets would go to the state (five percent for welfare children and three percent to water development). Five percent would go to the track and five percent for prize money. The remainder would be shared by bettors, and proponents say that is not enough. The water amendment, which was attached to the track bill, was a last-minute addition.

Sen. John Montford of Lubbock in return for his vote, may be removed in House action, and Montford's trade-off may be for naught.

Farmworkers' Comp

The farmworkers bill would make about 45 percent of Texas agriculture workers eligible for disability under the Workers' Compensation Act. Only farms and ranches that employ at least 12 persons, or which have an annual payroll of $50,000 are included.

The Senate initially rejected the bill, but passed it over the objections of rural legislators' arguments after a coalition of Republicans, urban conservatives and minority legislators lobbied the bill.

Although the bill is aimed at large growers and not family farmers, observers wonder whether it will pass the Senate where it will pass the House.
