Big festival scheduled Saturday in Weimar

The biggest party Weimar has had since the Bicentennial, The Jackson Square Festival, is scheduled Saturday.
The reason for the celebration is the dedication of the Gazebo, a Victorian style bandstand on the grounds of the Weimar Library in the center of Jackson Square. That is the most historic spot in the city, named after the town's founder, Squire D. W. Jackson.

The gazebo is a gift from the former city manager, Tom Hinton and his wife, Mary, to the people of Weimar. The couple took an idea that has been floating around for some time and made it reality, and many other folks have pitched in to put on the finishing touches.
The square area between Center and Mechanic streets will be blocked off from 5 p.m. until 10 p.m. Saturday. The celebration will begin with a band concert at 5 p.m. by the Weimar High School Band. About 6 p.m. there will be a dedication ceremony with Mayor Tommy Brasher presiding.
After the officials are finished, there will be many food and drink booths available, as well as fun and games.
Don't like milk? You're not alone!
"Many women say they don't like or can't drink milk. They are not unlike the average American woman," according to Marilyn Haggard, a foods and nutrition specialist with the Texas Agricultural Extension Service.
