White recovers, like boxer between rounds

Some lawmakers were asking the puzzling question last week: Once the governor has vetoed your bill, how can you undo his veto? The answer: you can't.

As he raced towards the veto deadline last week, Gov. Mark White stamped "No" on about 40 bills, caught some heat from legislators who were upset when their hard work went for naught, then lined out one item from the $31 billion budget bill before signing it.

For an encore, he jumped the gun on lawmakers by calling them back into a special session to extend the life of the Texas Employment Commission and to enact a brucellosis program for Texas ranchers.

White, who wobbled politically near the end of the regular session just three weeks ago, was moving like a boxer who has cleared his head between rounds.

He danced wisely too, appearing clear of public legislative battles and letting the legislature set its own course.

And while White obviously again enjoyed being governor, a few other state officials and public figures had a bad week.

With lawmakers gone home until last Wednesday, reporters turned their magnifying glasses to other areas of scrutiny, and writing of their discoveries of real or seemingly misdoings.

Among the targets:

Jim Mattox
Attorney General Jim Mattox, the "People's Lawyer," personally lent his 1982 election campaign $125,000 only a few days after his brother and sister borrowed the same amount at low interest from a Seattle bank.

In obtaining loans for use in their campaigns.

His campaign records show that Mattox borrowed from his siblings within five days after their initial transaction. He told reporters that his family owed him a substantial amount of money, and that after they paid him, he put it into his campaign effort.

However, the records also show that following fundraising after his victory, his campaign repaid himself the $125,000 plus interest totaling contributions to politicians and his involvement in several oil and land related lawsuits.

Last week he drew fire again after he won a Texas Supreme Court lawsuit which his opponents in court claim will cost them $2 million which Manges will make.

The losers petitioned that two high court justices be removed from the case because Manges had given them large contributions, directly or indirectly.

The petition alleges that Justice Ted Robertson received $100,000 from a political action committee funded largely by Manges and that Justice William Kilgore received $17,000 from Manges attorney, San Antonio Pat Maloney.

Lewis countered by saying he would seek private donations to fund the renovation, adding it might not cost the state anything.

Jim Hightower Agriculture Commissioner Hightower took a hit from one story which criticized him, for using state funds to mail out quasi-campaign material.

Hightower's Clip Sheet, which is written, edited and printed and mailed at state expense, included a story in which Hightower's Democratic Party ties and activities are featured. He even took swipes at republicans.

State officials usually send such mail with disclaimers of public expense printed on them.
