"An Apple for the Teacher" TIPS TO CLIP
That shiny apple sitting on the teacher's desk may have had a little help getting groomed for the first day of school. It's not all just for cosmetic purposes, either. Certain fruits and vegetables are often given a coating of wax that not only enhances appearance but improves quality. You see, when some produce is washed at the packing plant to clean off dirt and sprays, the natural waxy covering may be removed. This increases moisture evaporation and loss of quality, flavor and nutrients. So a new coating is put on, under limitations set up by the Food and Drug Administration for the public safety. This is also common on some cucumbers, citrus, tomatoes, apples, peppers and honeydew melons. In some cases, fungicides may also be added to further control decay. Toxicologists claim this type "waxing" poses no problems to human beings because a very small amount is used and it is not harmful. Fresh vegetables and fruits should be washed before eating.
