"Restructured Meat"

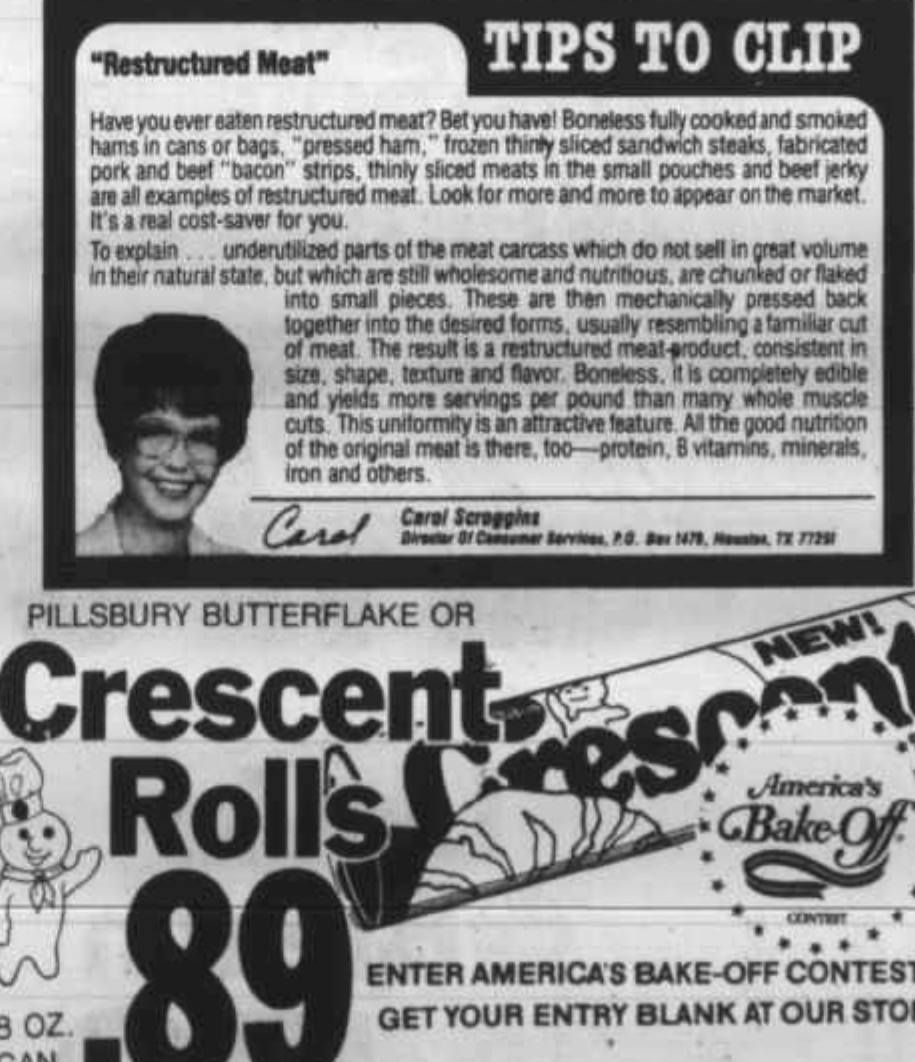

TIPS TO CLIP

Have you ever eaten restructured meat? Bet you have! Boneless fully cooked and smoked hams in cans or bags, "pressed ham," frozen thinly sliced sandwich steaks, fabricated pork and beef "bacon" strips, thinly sliced meats in the small pouches and beef jerky are all examples of restructured meat. Look for more and more to appear on the market. It's a real cost-saver for you.

To explain... underutilized parts of the meat carcass which do not sell in great volume in their natural state, but which are still wholesome and nutritious, are chunked or flaked into small pieces. These are then mechanically pressed back together into the desired forms, usually resembling a familiar cut of meat. The result is a restructured meat product, consistent in size, shape, texture and flavor. Boneless. It is completely edible and yields more servings per pound than many whole muscle cuts. This uniformity is an attractive feature. All the good nutrition of the original meat is there, too—protein, B vitamins, minerals, iron and others.
