Wright could be right Democratic presidential candidate

At the Texas Capitol speculation has surfaced that U.S. House Speaker Jim Wright could walk into the Democratic party national convention as a presidential draft candidate.

The idea is not far-fetched. Nationwide, Democrats are fragmented behind the several announced candidates, and it's no secret that party officials are open to the possibility of having the convention draft a unifying figure or figures.

The top draft possibility is New York Gov. Mario Cuomo, who only last week said he, as a non-candidate, would still remain open to a draft.

But Wright is coming on strong on the national scene and cannot be overlooked.

His recent defenses of President Reagan on several issues showcase him as a strong national leader for the Democrats.

Wright's intervention in the Nicaraguan peace talks won him the attention and approval of the nation's Hispanic Democrats.

Convention draft
The scenario assumes the numerous primary candidates forge only fragmented blocs among the party's electorate resulting in a deadlocked convention.

After a few ballots, delegates realize no compromise can be reached using any of the candidates. They look for nationally known Democrats, and Jim Wright's name pops up along with Cuomo's.

The idea of Cuomo and Wright on the same ticket, linking Texas and New York, North and South, could irresistible.

Party leaders might then call in the fabled candidates, bargain for their support, cut a deal and go on the floor for delegate approval.

What they could possibly hammer out is a Texas-New York link to match George Bush's regional strength.

Lesser rewards to the Midwest candidates will counter Bob and Elizabeth Dole's strength there.

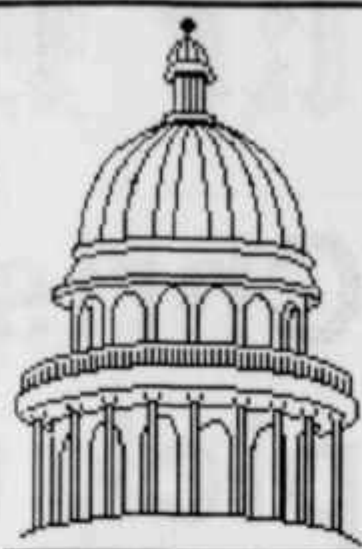

Just a little pre-convention kickoff speculation.

English-first ballot
Top leaders of the Texas Republican Party voted last week to put a non-binding referendum on their primary ballot which seeks to have the Legislature make English the official language in this state. More than a dozen states have already done so.

Immediately, Hispanic leaders throughout Texas denounced the proposal as discriminatory. The proposal would eliminate the printing of ballots and other government documents in any other language but English.

Democrats accused the Republican executive committee of using the proposal as a ploy to lure voters to their primary.

Democrat also blasted the new voter registration drive planned by GOP Secretary of State Jack Rains.

Rains wants to use airlines, hotels and other sites where citizens line up to do business to register voters.

"Rains' strategy is selective and more likely to register Republicans than anybody else," said Democratic state party chairman Bob Slagle.

He cited Rains' ambition for the Governor's mansion in 1990 as incentive for the registration drive.

Supporters of Rains' unique plan point out that Slagle and other Democrats don't object to selective registration in the past which recruited new Democratic voters from predominantly Hispanic and Black areas.

Mattos rips Contra Arms
Attorney General Jim Mattox, who recently toured Nicaragua, ripped the U.S. policy of sending arms to the rebels fighting the Marxist Sandinista regime.

Speaking in Brownsville, Mattox said widespread poverty in Central America is aggravated by battles provoked by the U.S.

Having no kind words for the Marxist regime either, he said the conflict is forcing people into the hands of Communists.

Other highlights
The relative of a former Democratic governor joined the GOP last week. Andrew Briscoe III, who sought the Democratic gubernatorial nomination in 1990, is the distant cousin of former Gov. Dolph Briscoe.

State Rep. Mike Milligan will not seek re-election to his East Texas seat. Texas Republicans are likely to field a cohesive slate of Texas State premier court candidates to bolster new chief justice Thomas Phillips, the lone Republican on the high court.

Teacher salaries in Texas have dropped to 26th in the nation, a fall of five places following the controversial school reforms.

Texas consumers urged to report any Florida citrus seen for sale in Texas

Texas consumers are being asked to protect Texas citrus from a devastating disease by reporting any Florida citrus they see for sale in Texas.

Florida citrus for sale in Texas should be reported to the nearest office of the Texas Department of Agriculture, because the fruit could contaminate Texas citrus and devastate an industry just now starting to recover from the 1983 freeze, said TDA's deputy commissioner Mike Moeller.

"TDA already has increased its inspections in grocery stores statewide in an effort to locate any illegal fruit," Moeller said. "We want to make consumers aware of the problem since their input can increase our enforcement's effectiveness."

A federal quarantine enforced by the U.S. Department of Agriculture prohibits fresh Florida citrus from being transported to Texas and other citrus-producing states.

Citrus canker is a bacteria that kills citrus trees and renders fruit unmarketable, explained TDA's regulatory entomologist Darrell Williams.

"Citrus canker is the most aggressive citrus disease known to man," he said. "It is highly contagious and spreads easily." Williams said. "Only control for a canker outbreak is to burn the infested materials. It's easy to see the importance of keeping the disease out of the citrus-growing Rio Grande Valley could result in the destruction of the citrus industry in Texas."

In addition to trying to locate Florida citrus in grocery outlets, TDA inspectors also are working in conjunction with USDA to inspect South Texas nursery stock in an effort to detect any possible outbreaks of citrus canker, Moeller said.

Controlling an outbreak of canker is expensive, as evidenced by the fact that more than half a century ago Floridians spent more than $6 million in an effort to eradicate the dreaded disease. As a part of the eradication effort, they destroyed 2.25 million citrus trees in a 20-year period starting in 1910, Moeller said. To date, the disease still has not been eradicated in Florida, Moeller added.

TDA officials most recently worked with the USDA to halt the sale of oranges and grapefruit in Longview. USDA currently is considering whether to send penalties against the Mississippi shipper responsible for the violations.

Florida citrus generally is identified as such on crates or bags in which it is packaged or on in-store advertisements such as banners.

More information about reporting Florida citrus or citrus canker is available by calling Williams at (512) 463-7619 or TDA's closest district office.

Views On Dental Health UNSIGHTLY SPACES

If your teeth have unsightly spaces, especially in front where the gaps will show every time you open your mouth, you may want to consider the composite resin bonding technique. While applicable, this is a relatively less costly procedure and the results are excellent. "Not getting even better with today's rapidly improving technology.
