24 Hour Emergency Phone: 234-3834 Medicine Transfer from Nursing Mothers

Studies show that certain medicines are capable of passing from preg-nant women to their unborn children. If, during pregnancy, there is the possibilty of medication toxicity to the fetus, such medicines should be avoided. Another area of concern is with the potential transfer of medicine from mothers to breast-fed infants.

According to the Handbook of Nonprescription Drugs, the concentra-tion of a particular medicine in breast milk depends on many factors - the concentration in the mother's blood and characteristics of the medicine, such as its fat solubility and the degree to which it is bound to blood plasma protein and milk protein. Another factor is the time of breast-feeding. If the medicine must be taken routinely, it should be taken shortly after breast-feeding. This allows as much time as possible for the medicine to clear the mother's blood and allows for a lower concentration at the time

The Handbook of Nonprescription Drugs also indicates that aspirin and other salicylates should be used with caution by nursing mothers. Certain prescription drugs ideally should be avoided during breast-feed-ing. There are always exceptions, however, based on the health condition
