Mailing lists originate from a multitude of sources

While junk mail comes from a multitude of sources, contacting one organization can reduce the volume of mail received, explained a Texas Christian University marketing professor.

"It's staggering how much information is available on you," said Dr. Shannon Shipp. He noted one mailing list vendor that sells lists providing great detail on the solicited person.

"The company has lists which you just couldn't imagine - lists of all the people that live in the Northeast that have incomes of over $50,000, and who have purchased a major appliance within the last two years," Shipp outlined.

The data are collected from a variety of sources including such publications as state driver's license and motor vehicle registration.

Making automobile and drivers' license data public record has the consequence of making it available to direct marketers, Shipp said. "If people don't want that information to be available, they're going to have to work through their legislators to make that information not a matter of public record," he said.

Shipp suggested a more immediate way to reduce the tide of solicitations is by writing to the Direct Marketing Association. This voluntary association of direct marketers registers requests to be removed from mailing lists.

Before a DMA member makes a solicitation, it compares its list with the one of those who have been asked to be removed. Names appearing on the DMA list are removed from member's list.

Shipp stressed that DMA membership is voluntary and not all solicitations will cease. He said, however, that writing to the DMA can reduce the flow of direct mail.

To have your name removed from solicitation lists write: Direct Marketing Association, Mail Preference Service, 11 West 42nd St., P.O. Box 3861, New York, NY 10163-3861.
