Time is what children really need

What do children really need?

It is a question frequently asked of clinical psychologist Dr. Michelle Forester, head of preschool services at the Learning Support Center at Texas Children's Hospital. The answer, which she gives to parent groups in talks about the emotional development of young children, is usually very simple.

"Above all, children need time," Forester stressed. "Our priorities get most of our time and children know this. When children get undivided attention from parents, they feel important. It's the best ingredient for building self-esteem."

For this reason, the Learning Support Center at Texas Children's in Houston encourages a daily "floor time" session of at least 30 minutes with each parent, Forester said.

"This is a structured playtime where the child is the leader and the parent is the assistant," she explained. "The child decides what to play and how to play it. This provides children with safe arenas for expressing themselves and what is vital to them to the most important people in their lives—their parents."

Another component children want is discipline, said Forester.

"Children want limits. They need to know that the adults in their lives care enough to stop them from unsafe (See Time, Page 5)
