New Ways to Treat Prostate Cancer

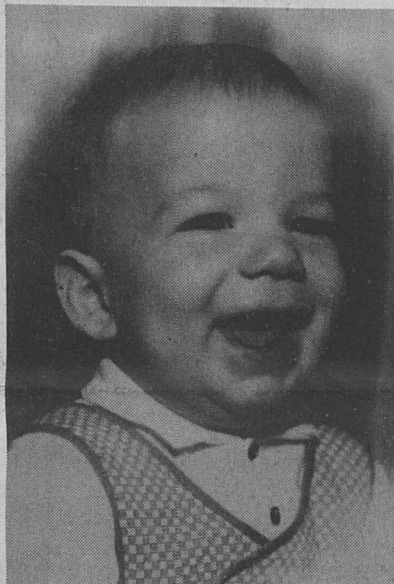

June 12 - 18 is designated Men's Health Week. This is an excellent time for men to schedule a visit to their doctor or medical group. One part of a physical examination for men usually involves a blood test called a PSA, which is a screening procedure for prostate cancer. The prostate is a walnut-shaped organ lying between the urinary bladder, rectum, and the pelvic bone. Early stages of cancer in this area usually show no symptoms. In later stages tumor growth can obstruct urine flow, cause blood to occur in the urine, or result in new tumors that migrate to bone tissue.

Radiation and surgical removal of the prostate gland have been used to slow or stop the disease. An alternative to surgery is brachytherapy, the implantation of "radioactive seeds" that irradiate and destroy cancer from inside the body. Radiation with palladium-103 combined with brachytherapy may cause less damage to adjacent organs such as the rectum and bladder. Temperature-monitored freezing (cryoblation) of the cancerous tissue has produced excellent results in select patients. Antiandrogen medicines are sometimes used in combination to maximize their effects. These include bicalutamine (Casodex) and goserelin acetate (Zoladex).
