Oldest WCJC student contributes to college

He's not your average college student, but then there's nothing average about Sylvan Miori, who at 76 is the oldest student enrolled in classes at Wharton County Jr. College (WCJC). When Miori began auditing classes 15-20 years ago, history, geography and psychology were his chosen subjects. In recent years, speech has become his favorite subject—so much it inspired him, along with his wife Betty, to award $1,000 in scholarships to the top orators at WCJC's fifth annual Speak Out! on Nov. 24.

Speak Out! brings together the college's top speech students to share insights about Wharton County Historical Museum exhibits. For Miori, a charismatic entrepreneur who has traveled the country delivering speeches to professional and non-profit organizations, talking to college students is one way to share his energy, wit and wisdom. Through his class speeches, he has promoted the causes he is most passionate about—encouraging young adults to become regular blood donors and encouraging them to get a college education.

The latter became easier for Ashley Williams of Bay City and Meagan Zepeda of Katy when they each received a $500 scholarship at Speak Out! following their selection by a jury based on content, organization and delivery. Williams spoke about Wharton educator C.W. Dawson, and Zepeda spoke about Wharton County Sheriff "Buckshot" Lane.

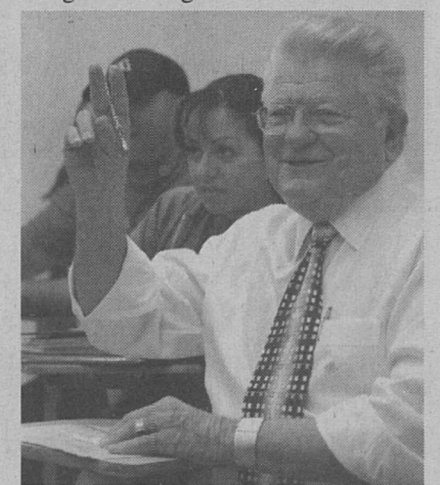

Dr. Mary Austin Newman is Miori's current speech professor. She said Miori "energizes the class" and is an "all-around good student" who would make an A if he were taking the class for credit.

Although scholarships haven't been awarded in previous Speak Out! competitions, Newman said Miori liked being in her class and wanted to support Speak Out! with the scholarships as a way to recognize and encourage students' talents and efforts. "He's active in making a lot of things happen in Wharton and for our college," she added.

Miori admits that being in the class prompted him to give. A true storyteller who loves to make people laugh, he momentary detours from talking about his gift as he drops the teaser that his college "disappeared." Miori goes on to say that Texas A&M wanted him to be an Aggie so bad that "they bought my college," referring to his alma mater, Texas A&I in Kingsville, now Texas A&M University-Kingsville.

As Miori talks again about WCJC and the speech scholarships, he sets aside his jovial nature. "You have a much better chance of succeeding with a college degree," he said, noting that students are not just young people, but also older, single moms who want to gain the necessary skills so they can support themselves and their children. Miori is delighted to help college students, because one of his tenets for living—which, of course, he shared in a class speech—is to "always remember the people who helped you along the way and to be nice to the people working under you." Miori's life is a testimony to this tenet as he not only delivers speeches, but the hope for a brighter tomorrow for deserving college students and proof that he's anything but average.
