Some Burns Can be Treated at Home

Over 2 million Americans require some type of treatment for topical burns each year. Burns are caused by excessive exposure to direct heat, the sun, chemicals, or contact with an electrically live object. First degree burns, such as serious sunburns, develop a painful pink color and affect only the uppermost layers of the skin. If the burn goes deeper and ranges from dark red to yellow-white while causing exquisite pain, then it is usually classified as a second degree burn. Burns that cause no pain because the nerve endings has been so severely damaged, with no blistering are called third degree burns. An example of a third degree burn is from extended contact with steam or fire, where damage reaches further to the subcutaneous skin tissue.

In general, third degree burns and burns in children under age 2, should always be seen by a physician. Also, burns to the hands, feet, face, genitals or any burn that does not cause pain should be treated immediately. Generally, most of the other types of burns can be treated at home. Cocoa butter, glycerin, and petroleum jelly applied to the burn area can act as a skin protectant. If the skin is broken, applying an antibacterial ointment will usually prevent infection. Burns that fail to improve in 5 to 7 days should also be seen by a physician.
