Juvenile Rheumatoid Arthritis Pain Relief

Juvenile rheumatoid arthritis is a persistent or recurring inflammation of the major joints, that occurs in children and teenagers. It is the most common form of arthritis in children and affects an estimated 30,000 to 50,000 children in the United States alone. The joint pain may come and go, however in this form of rheumatoid arthritis, any number of joints may become involved as well as other organs, including swelling of the spleen, liver, and lymph nodes. A high fever and rash may occur before the joints are affected. In severe cases, permanent damage to the joints occurs leading to physical deformities and irregular bone development, especially in areas of the jaw and chin. Inflammation of the iris of the eye is common with all forms of rheumatoid arthritis including the juvenile variety. If left untreated this type of eye inflammation can lead to permanent eye damage and even blindness.

Pain medicines are the most commonly prescribed drugs for treating rheumatoid arthritis, including the juvenile variety. Nonsteroidal anti-inflammatory drugs (NSAIDs), which include aspirin and ibuprofen, are excellent choices for relief of mild to moderate pain. Another class of NSAIDs called COX-2 inhibitors may also be useful in managing the pain of this type of rheumatoid arthritis.
