MEDICAL HISTORY AND YOUR DENTIST

One very good reason to share your medical history with your dentist is to help your dentist keep you from getting sick. Many people have chronic, but manageable, health conditions that require medication. Your dentist should know about potential interactions between medications you may need for your teeth and other medications you are taking. Some medications negate or minimize the effects of others.

It is especially important to share your medical history with your dentist if you have any type of heart condition, joint (knee or hip) replacement or compromised immune system. Antibiotics are sometimes prescribed before certain dental procedures to prevent bacteria from accumulating on defective heart valves or joint replacements.

Be sure that you provide your dentist with your complete history, including any over-the-counter medications you are taking.
