Fight Bugs With Bugs

Biological control, or the use of beneficial bugs to eat other bugs that typically damage crops is an area of study that continues to grow.

The science is not new. Ancient Chinese records describe the construction of bamboo runways to help predatory ants move through citrus groves.

Today there are hundreds of mail-order companies that sell predator or parasitic beneficial insects.

And researchers all across the country are investigating how some rarely studied predator bugs react with common pests and the eggs they lay.

For example, the University of Georgia College of Agricultural and Environmental Sciences experiments with tiger beetles showed that the beetle was a voracious eater when it came to devouring worms and grubs that feed on Georgia turfgrass and ornamental plants.

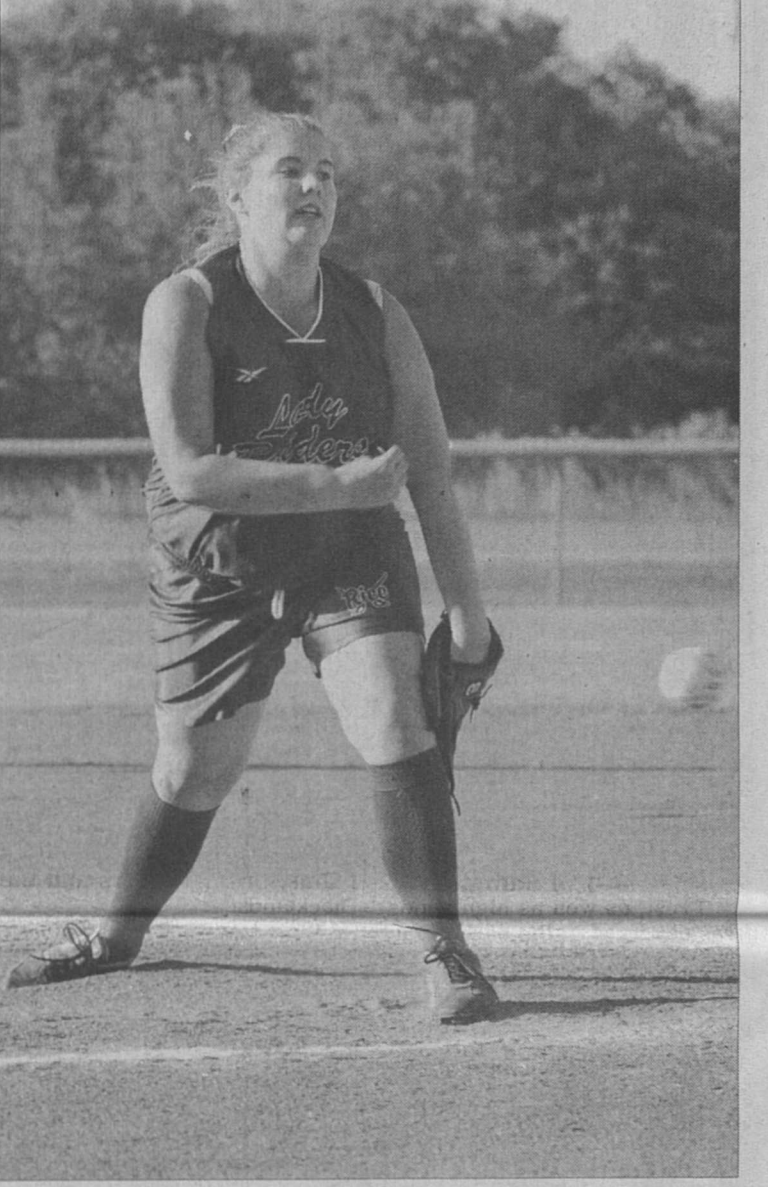

In Southern Texas, farmers are finding out that the cockroach, often considered the bane of society, feasts on insects harmful to crops.

The Asian cockroach, a flying variety, which looks almost identical to its German cockroach cousin (the cockroach most commonly found scavenging in homes) feeds on bollworm eggs that threaten cotton, soybean, corn, and tomato crops.

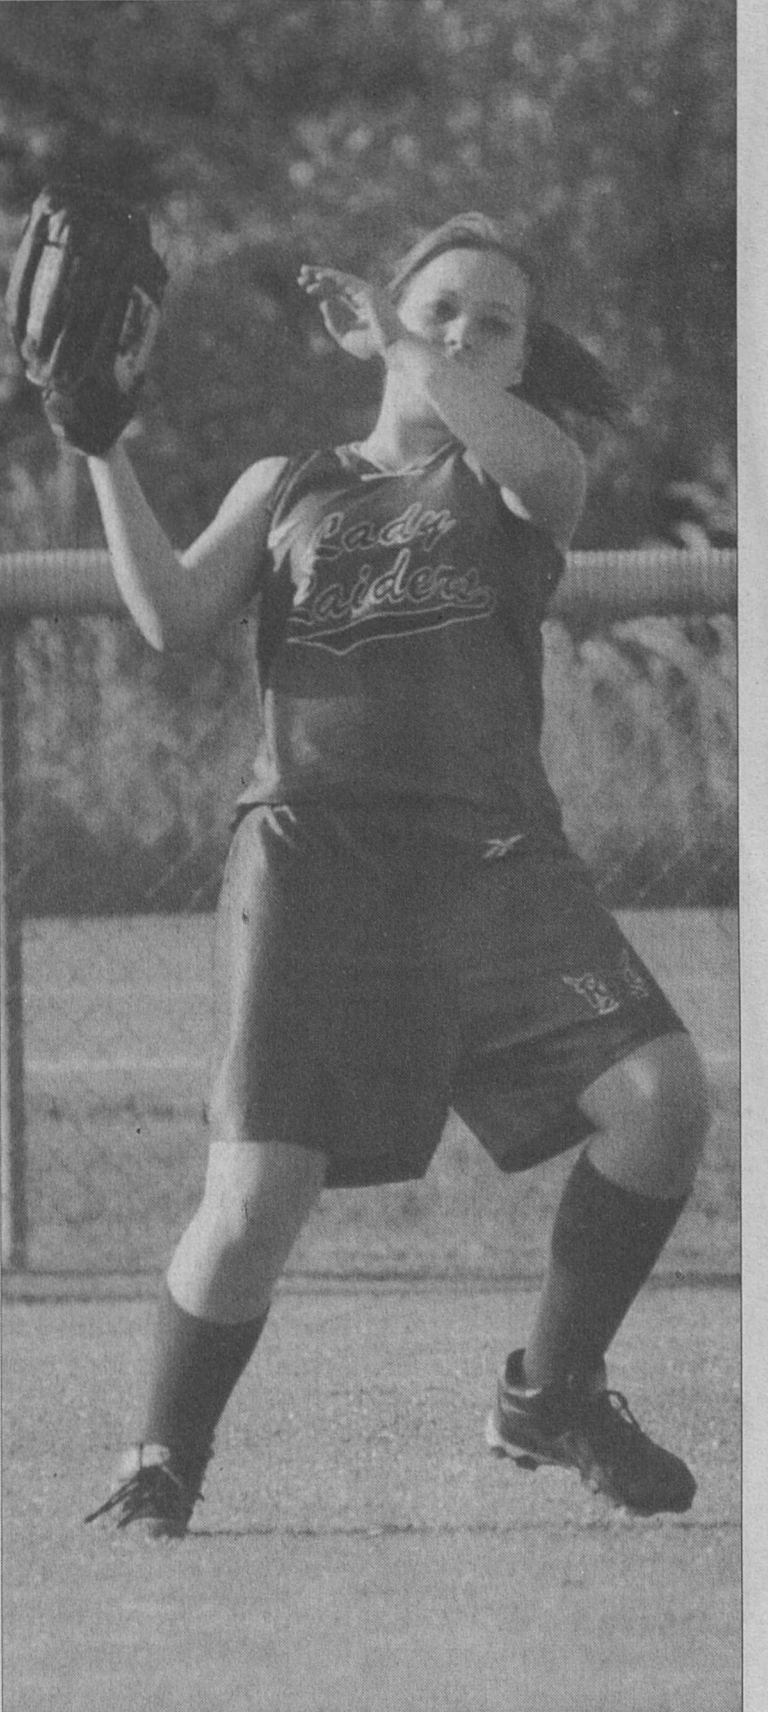

These Asian cockroaches also dine on other insects that damage crops.

Using natural insect predators to reduce the numbers of pests that destroy crops can be very beneficial in terms of reducing dependency on chemical pesticides.

More research needs to be conducted into the cost-effectiveness of beneficial bugs to the agriculture industry.
