KISSING MAY TELL

Husbands and wives share many things, including certain bacteria associated with gum disease. Dr. Steven Offenbacher, assistant professor in the Department of Periodontology at Emory University, found that if one member of a couple had a certain type of bacteria at the gum line, chances were good that the other person had the same bacteria.

"There are specific organisms associated with periodontal disease that are found only in the mouth," says Offenbacher, "so it's possible that they're transmitted from one person to another through regular intimate contact."

Since the symptoms of periodontal disease are not always obvious, it's important to continue regular checkups with your dentist, who can check for signs of the disease.
