NIGHTGUARDS

An estimated 95% of adults, who at some point grind or clench their teeth or jaws, often have pain in the temporomandibular joint (TMJ), a small "ball and socket" joint located slightly in front of the ear. This clenching and grinding, which is called bruxism, can also cause the muscles of the face to become sore and damage the teeth. To treat bruxism, patients may need to reduce emotional stress, and are often fitted with an oral appliance called a nightguard.

To make a night guard, the dentist takes molds or impressions of the upper and lower teeth. Next, the patient will need to bite into a piece of soft wax to record the position of the upper and lower jaw. When the nightguard is ready, the dentist may need to make a few minor adjustments to improve the fit. The patient should wear the appliance at night while sleeping, or during the day, whenever bruxism occurs.
